Then the concrete, which is prepared by machinery at a mill or mixing-house some distance above the mouth of the jettics, is carried out in a tramway-car drawn by a small locomotive, and dumped into the mould. The mixer is driven by a steam-engine, and the work progresses so rapidly that a large force of men is required to supply the machine with the necessary amount of sand, gravel, stone, and cement. One bundred barrels of cement are used up every day, and from three to four concrete blocks are turned out in the same space of time.

These blocks in the course of a week become so hard as to be able to successfully resist a smart blow from a hammer, while the older blocks resist the entrance of a sledge-driven spike.

The blocks are laid closely together, and on each side of them a slope of stone and gravel is afterwards put. This blanket effectually stops the passage of water, and facilitates the accumulation of sediment in the voids or spaces in the willow mat-

A Hend of Shyleck.

Elder, the artist, has on exhibition in Washington a painting which is remarkable in conception and beautiful in execution. It is a head of Shylock after the true ideal of Shakspeare. The terrible Jew holds a keen dagger in one hand, and is trying the edge with the finger of the other, the gleam of the steel aiding and blending the demoniacal look of the cruel eyes with splendid effect. Happily the artist's genius has given the full character of the cruel usurer, who counted and cheerfully. his ducats dearer than his daughter, without using the vulgar attributes of the hooked beak and animal features which belonged to he earlier and less intelligent conception of Shylock. Edmund Kean was the first actor who discarded that vulgar stage idea of the character, and his impersonation was so received us at once to consign the conventional Shylock to ostracism; and since that time all fine actors accept the decree of their eminent exemplar and of the public.

Mr. Elder's Shylock is on canvas what Lawrence Barrett's is on the stage, and what the actor with the same conception effects with one art the artist has done with the other. It is what the uncritical call a speaking picture, because it stands out from the canvas so perfectly that we imagine the cruel words of the fierce, revengeful Jew, and he seems there in the life just looking from the gilt frame as from a window. Fixing on some thoroughfare where a bridge crosses the Seine, two of them take stations, the first on one side of the river, the second on the other. Looking carefully around, they proceed to take measurements with cords and surveyors' instruments, until on each side quite a crowd has gathered. Next, one of the students selects some verdant youth who happens to be passing, and politely asks: "Would you kindly hold this cord, sir? There is going to be a Government survey. Please retain the cord till the official comes, on no account dropping it for an instant, as the measurement would thus be lost." He then gives the other end to a second invocent young man, and the way is thus effectually blocked. Meantime his comrade across the bridge has repeated the same performance. Calcehes, carriages, drays, all sorts of vehicles, with throngs of foot-passengers, have collected, who are gravely told that they must wait, as a Government survey is in progress. By this time the students, of course, have decamped, leaving the unlucky countrymen graph: to manage the impatient crowd as best they can. CONDENSED NOVELS .- [Baltimore Gazetle.]-The New York Herald publishes a touching street-car romance, to the effect that a young lady of wealth and respectability, named Clara Treadwell, lately became enamored of a street-car driver named Dennis McQuinn. She did not let concealment like a worm get in its work, but boldly told her love, and induced Dennis to abandon a former sweetheart and fly with her to Philaof a tumble-down tenement-house, but there are rumors that the bride's parents will enough to settle down on a western farm.
